Vegetarianism Victorious

Ugh, vegetarian food. What's the point of a curry without meat? How is a burger a burger if it's made from vegetables or some other meat "substitute"? Moo-cow, baa-lamb, chickadee, piggy--they were all bred for mangetout-ing, got that potato-head? Well, I have to say, I ate my words--a little--at the opening of Tibits restaurant--I would've eaten them a whole lot more if there hadn't been such a scrum for the buffet. A successful Swiss franchise, Tibits offers up fresh, tasty vegetarian food which is sold by weight. Aside from the novelty, the courgette lasagne went down pretty well and quinoa salads, dhal (perfectly cooked lentils how they should taste--not the mushy pap that so many veggies declare highly nutritious yet, they fail to acknowledge, disgusting in texture) and crumbed falafels all filled the hole nicely. However--and this is where it becomes clear that the emphasis is on taste, not just healthy options--the desserts were sublime and I would happily spend my complimentary £10 voucher on tiramisu alone. And finally, Tibits has a very well stocked bar and menu of delectable cocktails, something surely agreeable to vegetarian and carnivore alike.
